

Self-Reliance 2021 program

08:00-08:25 REGISTRATION

Section I: Self-reliance and planning for the future in the shadow of the coronavirus

The global economy is beginning to recover from the negative spiral caused by the coronavirus, but we do not yet know how the increasingly inevitable fourth wave will affect this fragile recovery. Although early in the pandemic, it seemed savings would also suffer, these fears were short-lived as household savings grew substantially in Hungary just as they did around the world. But what will happen to the extra savings stockpiled during the pandemic?

What will the fourth wave bring in the Hungarian savings market?

How do top Hungarian executives see the current situation of the savings market?

What tools can market players use to encourage long-term savings?

How will incumbents react to the emergence of fintechs and online investment service providers, which have come to the fore during the pandemic?

Section II: Wealth management and customer service at the highest level: Can Hungarian service providers come up with anything new?

Assets managed by private banks also rose to a new record high during the pandemic, even as new, online world order made acquiring new customers substantially more difficult. Investment fund managers have not had it easy, either: while funds have successfully weathered the panic last spring, there has been a constant stream of new regulatory requirements, while the emergence of passive funds and online service providers has not made making a profit any easier. Meanwhile, cautious spending has begun worldwide after restrictions were eased early this summer, but the fourth wave is increasingly casting a shadow on markets and economies. Is it worth banking on volatility in the long term? What will happen to the Hungarian forint and to the value of savings? Can traditional investment products come up with anything new, or will the future belong to alternative investments and new trends?

Section III: The future of regular savings - Will the willingness for self-reliance switch to a higher gear?

Household assets kept in government securities, investment funds, bank deposits and shares have increased during the pandemic, but retirement savings and life insurances have also performed well. But will the market of regular savings be able to reach younger generations, something it had failed to do so far? What will happen to the concept of welfare funds?

Has the pandemic made Hungarians realise the importance of self-reliance? Retirement and regular savings: how will the market attract new customers? Now that the pension bond has been abandoned, will welfare funds be a solution to the pension problem?
